RightThumb is an application that allows you to create thumbnails of any number of pictures with a single click. It's very easy to use, and the most important thing is that the thumbnails are ready right away. You can customize the size of the thumbnails, and the location where you want them to be saved to; this makes it possible to use it both on a desktop computer or a portable device. The application can also create thumbnails of pictures under various formats like JPEG, GIF, BMP, or PNG, and you can set the quality at which the thumbnails will be generated. It can be used to add thumbnails to the context menu, or set specific icons to the desktop, so you can always generate them with a single click. I know a Java profiler tool - JProfiler (My question is what are the advantages of the tool compared to a more standard profiler like VTune or DataGrip? A: You can know your code running without debugging, it can produce a snapshot of the object graph at any point in time, it is distributed, supports all languages with a JDK/JVM (but only if your language is supported by it) and more. For your specific question you can know your code running without debugging (at least in JDK 6+, JDK 9 is available too, but not tested yet) you can produce a snapshot of the object graph at any point in time (the recorded snap shot can be used to generate offline documentation with these tools) and it is a JVM tool (just like JProfiler and other tools that run in the JVM). Just to mention these are just a few of the features, some other very important ones are: the presence of JMC (the official Java model checker), JShell (a command line tool used to
