An email to customers on Tuesday revealed Microsoft plans to release a “consumer-focused” version of Skype in the fall of 2009, and also a version for business customers. Unlike the consumer version, the business one will not have video or voice capability, but will instead just support videotelephony. That indicates that even though Microsoft wants to maintain the Skype brand for business customers, it views the tool primarily as a consumer-focused one. Microsoft has been widely criticized for treating Skype as a productivity tool and forcing businesses to pay for it separately, because it had not earned its place in the enterprise as a core product. Microsoft may have lost market share to Google recently, but the company still holds a significant lead in Internet-based communication products. Microsoft will likely need to persuade business customers to start using Skype again, after they have fallen out of favor in the corporate world and been replaced by more secure products such as instant messaging from Microsoft, IBM, VMware and Cisco. Although some video-enabled productivity applications are appearing from other vendors such as Citrix, which acquired Xen Works. Microsoft’s “consumer-focused” version of Skype is likely to be free for consumers, although some features will require an upgrade to Skype, Microsoft says. A version of Skype for business will likely cost about $5 per month. In July, Microsoft said it was more than tripling the number of “Skype customers” to more than 70 million. According to Microsoft’s email to Skype customers, it is working on adding a number of new features to the chat and video service, including the ability to store and share contacts, options to search by date, location or presence,
