The recent cuts to city water supply as a result of the drying up of the Musi River in Hyderabad, India (often referred to as the Urban Valley) signal the end of an era for some: a time when the city was known as the City of Water. This paper shows how CUTS, an agency that deals with water management, has influenced residential water use in the city; how it has changed the urban landscape; and how it has affected the conceptualisations, perceptions, and social lives of water. Drawing on (un)restoration stories from nine key sites, this paper analyses the way in which water is understood and used in these places, and the impact of these understandings on individual lives. The paper highlights the lack of understanding among urban residents of the complexities of the water supply and distribution system, and the challenges of (re)provisioning water. While the paper emphasises the impacts of CUTS on everyday life in the city, it also shows how suburban dwellers have adapted, and in some cases revived, the water system, and created a new urban water landscape in the city, in alliance with their neighbours.Q: 09e8f5149f
