He broke his vows to the Church in secrecy and refuses to say anything about it. Then when he has a public story to tell, he lies about it to make himself look better. These things speak to a lack of integrity that is problematic to be sure. But not excusing his sin is likewise problematic. He could have either signed the letter of penance or not signed it. He could have spoken to his fellow officers without the press about his reasons for leaving. ~~~ j2bax All of these things are also true of the Catholic Church itself. ~~~ mc32 He could have just notified a superior in good faith and then gone ahead and told the world what happened. ~~~ krapp He could have, but he didn't. He's already admitted what happened, and apologized for it. His position is different from the position of his fellow clerics and he is not in a position to criticize them. ~~~ mc32 He could have just said what he said and gone about his business. ----- krapp >Why do people think he would have been forced to leave anyway? Because _anyone_ is going to be forced to leave if they openly insult the Pope's taste in music. He could have just told his colleagues "no more scandalous music, please" and everything would have gone on as usual. ~~~ simias I don't think this is the case. The Vatican is quite strict in having it's officials act in a particular way and the Pope isn't someone you can just tell "no more annoying music, please". He's the successor of St Peter, after all. I imagine you would have a chance to tell the Pope something like "this music is disturbing, it's like blasphemy"

Paulina F., a 27-year-old single graduate student in Des Moines, Iowa, and I are now officially engaged. We met last year on an old-fashioned blind date, where I asked her to be my girlfriend on a first date and she accepted. She's from the Czech Republic, and I'm from America. I proposed to her at the end of last year on Christmas Eve, and she said yes! We've been living together for about two years. I'm a college administrator, and she's a full-time student in her field. She's originally from Czechoslovakia but has lived in the U.S. for about six years now. I've had a prior relationship before I met her, but she's the first girl I've ever loved. Her father is a prominent economist at the World Bank, and she is part of a world-class academic family. (She's already a college professor.) I've been playing the guitar for the last few years, and I'm constantly writing and practicing. I enjoy playing music, and she says she loves hearing me play. She's currently studying classical piano and guitar and plays a bit of the violin. She also enjoys tap dancing, karate, exercise classes, hiking, and ice skating. She's half-American, so there's a good chance she'll be moving to America after we get married. We met in college, but we moved to the same city and started living together for a while before we got engaged. We're comfortable with the fact that we're living together before marriage. It makes us feel secure, and it's a bit easier to make important decisions when we live together. When I proposed, she said yes. We both thought the timing was perfect. I was confident about the marriage, but she didn't have as much faith in the relationship. When I got down on one knee and proposed, she said yes without hesitation. She wanted me to propose the traditional way, so I proposed on Christmas Eve, and we were married three weeks later. Paulina likes to go to farmer's markets. She works at her school's food cooperative, and she likes to try a wide range of ethnic cuisines. I don't cook, but I do enjoy being at her house for dinner. She said she likes the way I make her laugh. We went to a food bank the other
